March posted strong returns with all sectors in positive territory. Expectations for a reduction in interest rates by the US Federal Reserve are still on the horizon but once again pushed out due to lingering inflation. The economy continues to hold up well in this higher for longer interest rate environment with earnings expected to provide support for equity prices.

The portfolio underperformed the Russell 1000 Index during the month. Security selection in healthcare and financials, as well as the lack of exposure to the energy sector detracted the most from relative performance. Conversely, security selection in information technology, consumer discretionary and industrials contributed. Of the fund's holdings, the largest contributors were Nvidia, Chart Industries and NextEra Energy. Nvidia, a multinational technology company, was the largest contributor to portfolio performance as the company continues to see accelerating demand for its GPU semiconductors from hyperscalers and enterprises. The second biggest contributor was Chart Industries, which provides services and equipment for cryogenic liquefaction of gases, reporting better than expected fourth quarter 2023 earnings in late February. NextEra Energy, a renewable energy company, contributed to portfolio performance driven by a favourable outlook update provided by management during the company's annual Renewable Development Day. The top three relative detractors were Zoetis, Bio-Techne and Accenture. There were no initiations or outright sales in March.

Many of the challenges facing the economy continue to be in focus going forward as inflation, monetary policy decisions, fiscal deficits and renewed geopolitical conflicts remain in the headlines. Nonetheless, there continue to be opportunities resulting from the resilient labour market, continued strong consumer spending and persistent tailwinds from government spending on infrastructure, semiconductors and clean energy. We continue to seek to invest in companies with secular tailwinds or strong product-driven cycles.
